INTRODUCTION.

TO the man of feeling, few arguments need be used in favour of MEDICAL CHARITIES. The utility of such institutions is fully evinced by the great number of necessitous objects continually applying to them for relief.

To support a decent appearance, and purchase the mere necessaries of life, is as much as the hard-working man is able to do, at this time, when in full employ. From a variety of events not to be foreseen, a total stagnation in his branch of trade may happen; his earnings and his wants have hitherto, perhaps, kept even pace: he has not therefore been able to make any reserve; his last penny is nearly spent:—Under these circumstances he is attacked with a grievous disorder, and probably a numerous family dependent on him for their daily bread, are deprived of their support:—He now feels the double load of sickness and poverty; and without the charitable interposition of the benevolent Samaritan, must inevitably sink under its weight.

To assist the poor in such situations of complicated distress, is a duty incumbent on the rich, and that duty a DISPENSARY affords them an opportunity of discharging, in a manner the most effectual with respect to the poor, and the least burthensome with respect to themselves.

The peculiar utility of this mode of Charity, by which the sick poor are relieved at their own habitations, is so fully confirmed by experience, and the general voice of an approving public, that no apology is necessary for extending it to the eastern parts of this city.

INTRODUCTION.

The great deficiencies in the plan of an HOSPITAL are completely supplied in that of a DISPENSARY. The industrious mechanic who cannot, without great inconvenience, leave his family and reside in an HOSPITAL;—the tender infant, who cannot be separated from its mother to receive the benefit of it;—the asthmatic and consumptive who, from the nature of their complaints, cannot be admitted into it;—all these are provided with requisite assistance in this charity.

The sum which entitles the Subscriber to the privileges of a Governor is so small, that those who are possessed but of moderate fortunes may render themselves highly useful to their indigent neighbours, and enjoy the exalted pleasure of becoming, through the medium of this Establishment, eyes to the blind,—feet to the lame,—and health to the sick.

On these principles the MIDDLESEX DISPENSARY is founded; and as the number of respectable persons, who reside in the eastern parts of the metropolis, is considerable, and the multitude of necessitous poor who live around them is great, the most sanguine expectations may be reasonably entertained, that it will soon be an INSTITUTION as flourishing as the design of it is benevolent.
